

Unit 3: Sensation and Perception

The structure of human biological systems and their functions influence our behavior and mental processes. Some psychologists study behavior and mental processes from a biological perspective. This includes an examination of the influence that the interaction between human biology and our environment has on behavior and mental processes. This is a recurring topic throughout the course that will be used to explain many psychological phenomena. The biological perspective also provides insight into the causes of and treatments for psychological disorders. There is a complex interaction between a person's biology and their behavior and mental processes. Heredity and environment play a role, as do variations in a person's cerebral map.

Learning Objectives (Mark the box when you pass the External Practice Quiz on Schoology).
