

Operating Systems and System Programming Study Guide

This study guide covers various topics related to operating systems and system programming, including their definitions, components, and functions. It also discusses the relationship between operating systems and system programming, and the role of the kernel in the operating system.

1. Introduction

a. Operating Systems

- Operating systems are independent, self-contained operating units in an operating system.
- They represent running programs with their own memory space, code, and data.

b. Why Operating Systems Differ from Programs?

- Programs are static, while operating systems are dynamic and continuously running.
- Operating systems have many more functions than programs, allowing them to manage resources.

c. Operating Systems as Interactions with CPU

- Operating systems are implemented as interactions with the CPU using the Process Control Block (PCB).
- PCB contains process-specific information, such as process state, program counter, and registers.

d. Process Creation

- Processes are created through system calls, such as `fork()` or `exec()`, which create new processes.
- These processes inherit the attributes of the parent process and the operating system.

2. System

a. Operating Systems

- Operating systems are responsible for managing system resources.
- They provide the system interface to the user and the operating system.

b. Shared Resources

- Resources are shared within a system through system calls like `getenv()`, `setenv()`, `wait()`, and `waitpid()`.
- Resources are shared among processes, and users can share resources with other users in the same process.

c. User-Defined Resources: The user and Process

- Resources are user-defined, and users can define resources for themselves.
- Resources are used to define the user-defined resources that processes use.

d. Types of Resources

- Operating systems are managed by user-defined resources. Resources are used to define the user-defined resources that processes use.
- Operating systems are managed by the kernel, and the kernel has multiple resources for user-defined resources.
