

Responding to Terrorism: Challenges for Democracy

Study Guide—Part II

Review

1. In speeches and public statements, when asked for Canada's response to September 11, 2001,
 - a. Minister of Foreign Affairs Jean Chrétien announced the following four-point response plan for Canada's allies:
 - i. (Reinforcement) to reinforce support for allies
 - ii. (Readiness) and the readiness to respond that they will protect the interests that cause a development to require a quick and effective response
 - iii. (Cooperation) to ensure that these objectives reflect our role as a member of the community of nations
 - iv. (Strengthening) to ensure that the international community is able to respond to the challenges of the future
 - b. Chrétien's response was not seen as being as strong as he had intended, but was the basis of action.
 - c. John Manley, Minister of International Trade and Commerce (the international trading body), said Canada's plan:
 - i. "shows we will not stand alone."
2. However, the Ministry of International Trade and Commerce was not alone in 2001. Several key federal departments, including the House of Commons International Organizations and Institutions, as well as several other departments, including the Department of Foreign Affairs, were involved in the response to September 11, 2001.
 - a. How did the various groups and units contribute to the response?
3. National governments also created national security agencies, including Canada's National Security Agency (NSA), which was created in 2001. The NSA's mandate is to provide the government with the information it needs to protect Canada's security and to ensure that the government is able to respond to the challenges of the future.

	How did the government best protect the country?	How did the government best protect the country without affecting global trade?
Problems	The government's response to September 11, 2001, was a major challenge for the country. The government's response to the attack was to take a hard line on terrorism and to take a hard line on the economy. The government's response to the attack was to take a hard line on terrorism and to take a hard line on the economy.
