

4 Rethinking Evidence Practices for Environmental Decision-Making in the Anthropocene

What Can We Learn from Invasive Species Research and Policy?

Christoph Kueffer

We live in a time of multiple, interacting and accelerating crises, including climate change, overexploitation of natural resources, pollution, growing inequalities and injustice, political and social instabilities, war, migration and weakened democratic and truthful deliberations.¹ Many of these crises are directly or indirectly linked to the degradation of ecosystems and biodiversity loss.² Since 1993, the nations of the world have committed themselves to the protection and restoration of the Earth's diversity of life through the UN's Convention on Biological Diversity (CBD).³ The UN Decade on Ecosystem Restoration from 2021 to 2030 further emphasizes the urgent need to reverse the degradation of ecosystems worldwide within the coming years.⁴

Evidently, the current economic system is a major driver of ecological degradation,⁵ and technological solutions will not suffice to avert catastrophic climate change and biodiversity loss.⁶ The UN's "17 Sustainable Development Goals" of the 2030 Agenda for Sustainable Development instead recognize the need for integrative sociocultural and ecological solutions.⁷ This will require that the voices and ecological competencies of diverse cultural groups, many of them marginalized or oppressed, must be strengthened with the help of expertise from the humanities, social sciences and arts.⁸ Following an era dominated by economics and engineering, the 21st century must become a century of cultural diversity and ecological sensibilities. Indeed, ecology is reaching the status of a guiding natural science of our time. Since 2012, the Intergovernmental Science-Policy Platform on Biodiversity and Ecosystem Services (IPBES) has been coordinating experts around the world to assess ecological knowledge for policy-making.⁹ While for most of the 20th century physics was seen as the paradigmatic model of scientific inquiry, in the 21st century, we must better appreciate the ontological, epistemological, methodological and pragmatic implications of an ecological view of nature and human-nature relationships.¹⁰ Rich and thorough ecological expertise is essential for an urgently needed societal transformation toward a sustainable future.¹¹
