

EPILOGUE

Six months later

Becoming a parent does something to you. It shifts your insides, flips everything on its head. You're no longer the lead character in your own life. You become a side character, a throwaway. The person who takes the bullet, jumps in front of the train, drowns while rescuing the lead.

Nova is three months old now. We chose the name for obvious reasons. We needed a new start, and she gave that to us.

From the moment they laid her on my chest, she became the most important thing to ever come into my life. More important than my career, more important than Jeremy, more important than my guilt.

Until Nova, I had convinced myself that Verity's manuscript must be the truth. But now that I have Nova, I cannot fathom how a mother could write such awful things about her own children if they were untrue. There isn't enough desperation in this career for me to think writing anything negative about my daughter would in any way be helpful
