

schools through multiple initiatives. First, the state requires each district to develop and revise annually a district improvement plan, the TCSPP. State staff provide technical assistance in the development of the TCSPP and annually review for approval these plans. Second, for districts struggling with providing support to its low-performing schools.

Conclusions

This proposed study will work on the hypothesis that: the higher the competency of teachers and school personnel in implementing the accountability guidelines, the better they can manage and discipline students. In addition, this development would necessitate an enhancement on the student's academic performance.
