Mobility and Biography: Methodological Challenges and Perspectives

Abstract: This introductory article discusses methodological challenges for and perspectives related to a field of study that has only recently gained importance in historical research: transnational lives. For a long time, methodological nationalism had slowed down or even prevented investigations of individual or collective life-courses that were characterised by a high degree of mobility and internationality. We argue that a critical engagement with concepts from the social sciences related to the current interest in processes of globalisation and transnational phenomena can open up new perspectives on “mobility and biography”. In doing so, we first explore how focusing on lives that crossed political, social or cultural boundaries can bring aspects of individual agency together with larger structural settings as explanatory factors. In the second part, this article attempts to conceptualise transnational lives for historical research. Introducing our own concept of “cosmobilities”, we demonstrate how engaging with two sociological strands, “rooted cosmopolitanism” and “mobilities”, might provide a fresh impetus for analysing transnational subjects and their practices.

In 1849, Lorenz Brentano, today an almost forgotten activist during the European Revolutions of 1848/49 in the Grand Duchy of Baden, set sail with his wife via Switzerland for the United States. Almost thirteen years later, in 1862, this son of a merchant from Mannheim with family roots in Treviso (Lombardy) was finally granted an amnesty. Nonetheless, Brentano, who by then had settled in Chicago and acquired US citizenship, would not return to Germany for good. Only during his term as American consul in Dresden from 1872 to 1876 did he resettle for an extended period in Germany.¹ At first glance, then, and in particular as displayed in dictionaries of national biography like the Neue Deutsche Biographie and the American National Biography, Brentano seems to have lived two separate lives: as
