Models Of Cancer Survivorship Care:

Models of Cancer Survivorship Care U. S. Department Human Services, Agency for and Quality, 2014-05-12 As of January 2012 the United States had nearly 14 million cancer survivors with 59 percent ages 65 years or older The number of survivors is projected to grow to 18 million by 2022 Survivors that is patients who have completed active treatment have unique physical psychological social and spiritual health needs Even as the oncology workforce is projected to experience substantial shortages the number and needs of cancer survivors is projected to increase Relative to pediatric cancer survivors adult survivors i e survivors of adult onset cancers are understudied Further their health care needs differ from those of pediatric survivors adult survivors may have an increased risk for comorbidities presenting unique care coordination challenges Consequently this Technical Brief seeks to increase knowledge regarding survivorship care models for adult cancer survivors 19 years of age or older Cancer survivors have unique post treatment needs as these individuals may have higher risks of recurrence and secondary cancers chronic or late occurring effects of cancer or cancer treatment comorbid conditions that may have been exacerbated by cancer treatment and increased likelihood of preventable morbidity and mortality that can be reduced by health promotion activities These unique needs highlight the importance of care programs specifically tailored for cancer survivors As described in the Institute of Medicine IOM report From Cancer Patient to Cancer Survivor Lost in Transition survivorship care i e the delivery of health care services specifically designed for cancer survivors ideally includes 1 prevention of new primary and recurrent cancers and other late effects 2 surveillance for recurrence or new cancers 3 interventions for illnesses secondary to cancer and cancer treatment including physical consequences of symptoms such as pain and fatigue psychological distress experienced by cancer survivors and their caregivers and concerns related to employment insurance and disability and 4 coordination between specialists and primary care providers PCPs to ensure that all the health needs of survivors are met Although these IOM recommendations form an important framework for examining cancer survivorship care they are largely based on expert consensus Developing appropriate health care programs that provide needed supports and enhance relevant outcomes for individuals with cancer following completion of acute i e potentially curative cancer treatment can be difficult An initial challenge for this project was to define a model of cancer survivorship care The term model is frequently used in the cancer survivorship literature but is rarely if ever defined Research shows general agreement that a model of survivorship care involves a broad and holistic approach to followup care for cancer survivors addressing multiple needs As discussed by Gilbert et al although approaches vary all models are directed toward the common goal of improving the quality of care provided to cancer survivors by delivering comprehensive coordinated and tailored followup care Survivorship has various definitions and encompasses varying stages of the cancer survivor s experience this report focuses only on individuals who have completed active cancer treatment and are transitioning from acute to more long term medical care objectives

BACKGROUND The number of cancer survivors in the United States is projected to grow to 18 million by 2020. In addition to the unique post treatment needs faced by all cancer survivors, adult cancer survivors have an increased risk for comorbidities that result in significant care coordination challenges. Few publications have described the structure, process, or outcomes of adult survivorship care models for this growing population with complex needs. The purpose of this Technical Brief is to describe existing and proposed models of survivorship care for survivors with adult onset cancer who have completed active treatment.

METHODS The Technical Brief integrates discussions with Key Informants and targeted searches of published and gray literature on questions of background, context, research gaps, and future research directions. We also conducted a comprehensive and systematic search of the evidence to answer questions on outcomes associated with models of survivorship care.

RESULTS The literature review and Key Informant information consistently indicated considerable heterogeneity in models of survivorship care components, models, survivor populations, and target outcomes. Models of survivorship care are highly individualized to the institution or setting where they are provided. Broad-based usual care for survivors does not exist. Although competing considerations and incentives may lead oncologists or oncology providers in many instances to continue seeing cancer survivors long after treatment ends, anticipated shortages in the oncology workforce may require other approaches such as the expanded use of nurse practitioners and physician assistants, shared care with primary care providers, and patient navigators. Concerns associated with these alternatives include payment considerations, adequacy of training, and the potential for fragmented care. Our systematic review of the literature for the Technical Brief identified nine empirical studies of survivorship care models covering nurse-led models, physician-led models, models in which survivorship care plan development is a key component, and individual or group counseling models. Future research is needed to explore the optimal timing of survivorship models, tailoring of models based on patient characteristics and risk factors, and key outcomes.

CONCLUSIONS The optimal nature, timing, intensity, format, and outcome of survivorship care models continue to be uncertain. The paucity of evidence limits our ability to make conclusions about the effectiveness of survivorship care models. Further research regarding survivorship care models focusing on issues including settings, processes, and continuity of care, payment types, types of health care providers involved, collaborations, and communications outcomes and differences associated with cancer type or patient sociodemographic characteristics is needed before recommendations and conclusions regarding model development, implementation, and evaluation can be made.
