EXHAUST NOZZLE ACTUATOR CONTROL

(Figure 14)

In order to provide the correct exhaust nozzle area for proper engine match in both the afterburning and non-afterburning conditions, a two position exhaust nozzle is provided. Pneumatic-powered, piston-type actuators are used to position the nozzle. High pressure compressor discharge air must be ported to the "nozzle open" side of the pistons when afterburning, and to the "nozzle close" side when non-afterburning. This is accomplished by the exhaust nozzle actuator control.

This control consists primarily of a spring-loaded, piston-actuated relay valve moving in a ported sleeve. High pressure compressor discharge air is used for the air supply. The exhaust nozzle actuator control piston senses the afterburner fuel control inlet pressure. This pressure rises sharply when the shuttle valve in the fuel pump transfer valve is shifted to the afterburning position. This increased pressure fuel flows into the exhaust nozzle control through a 10 micron filter, forcing the actuating piston and relay valve against the spring, venting the "close" side of the nozzle actuator piston to ambient pressure and porting compressor discharge air to the "open" side. Upon termination of afterburning, the pressure signal to the exhaust nozzle actuator control is decreased suddenly to pump boost pressure by the shuttle valve and the exhaust nozzle control relay valve is returned by the spring, venting the "open" side of the nozzle actuator piston to ambient pressure, and porting compressor discharge pressure to the "close" side. The atmospheric ports on the exhaust nozzle actuator control are covered by spring-loaded flapper valves to prevent entry of foreign material. Leakage of high pressure fuel past the relay valve piston is intercepted by a drain leading to pump inlet to reduce the amount of leakage through the overboard drain line.
