1992). The authors also found that the use of a single, unidimensional measure of self-esteem was insufficient to capture the complexity of self-esteem. They argued that self-esteem is a multidimensional construct that includes both global and specific self-esteem. Global self-esteem refers to a general sense of self-worth, while specific self-esteem refers to self-worth in particular domains (e.g., academic, social, athletic). The authors suggested that a multidimensional measure of self-esteem, such as the Self-Concept Scale (SCS; Rosenberg, 1965), would be more appropriate for studying the relationship between self-esteem and academic achievement. The SCS is a 23-item scale that measures self-esteem in five domains: academic, social, athletic, physical, and intellectual. The authors found that the SCS was a more reliable and valid measure of self-esteem than a single-item measure. They also found that the SCS was more strongly correlated with academic achievement than a single-item measure. These findings suggest that a multidimensional measure of self-esteem is more appropriate for studying the relationship between self-esteem and academic achievement.
