

The Great Pacific Garbage Patch

Far out in the northern part of the Pacific Ocean, there are waters where few ever cross. It is called the North Pacific Gyre. It is filled with an estimated 1.8 trillion pieces of garbage. This littered stretch of ocean is called The Great Pacific Garbage Patch. It's made up of debris, or garbage, such as old fishing gear, bottle caps, and plastic bottles.

In the late 1980's, Alaskan researchers found relatively high amounts of marine debris in certain areas of the ocean. These areas are known as gyres. A gyre is formed when water currents move around in a kind of clockwise motion. The current catches and holds floating pieces of garbage. The Garbage Patch is estimated to be double the size of Texas.

GARBAGE PATCHES MAP

Most of this garbage comes from the Pacific Rim. This includes Asia and North and South America. The garbage gets funneled into this central location. On the garbage breaks down due to the rain, and waves.

Peppered Soup

As these plastics break down, become microplastics, or very plastic. These tiny microplastics continue to move through the ocean. through the plastic gets so small, it really goes away, and it is of no use.

Imagine a bowl of soup. Flakes floating through it.

Cleaning Up Concerns

Cleaning up this mess is not easy. Large plastics may be easy to clean up. However, microplastics make the task a bit more complicated.

Many of these tiny particles are the same size as small sea animals. Nets that could be used to scoop up the garbage would also scoop up these tiny creatures. The sea creatures are essential to the ocean's food web. Getting rid of them could put the entire ecosystem at risk.

Dead sea turtle among plastic

The cost is another problem and location, no nation will take or pay the massive expense of cleaning the National Ocean and Atmospheric Administration's (NOAA) Marine Program estimated that it would cost $16 billion to clean up just one percent of the trash.

Taking Action

What can we do to help? We can prevent more garbage from getting into waterways. The most obvious way is to never throw trash out of boats or along shoreways. Rain and wind can carry it into our drains and out into our waterways.

Another way we can help is by eliminating the use of plastic or recycling. Plastic is not biodegradable which means they never break down over time. There are reusable biodegradable materials that can be used such as reusable straws and cups. Some cities are even banning the use of plastic straws for this reason.

Finally, we can do our part by educating people around us. Remind others to always recycle trash in the proper bins and to recycle. Taking care of our planet is important. It is the first step toward a cleaner, more beautiful Earth.
