a constant back and forth between feeling high and low. This roller-coaster of emotions can be draining for parents. In order to move through the grieving process, it is important to remember that no emotion is wrong. Allow yourself the space to feel all the emotions as they arise.

Reach out to other NICU parents or support groups. Connecting with parents who have gone through similar experiences and understand the roller-coaster of emotions you may be feeling can provide you with a much-needed sense of comfort and community. Chelsea and her husband made lifelong friends through their NICU experience with whom they still communicate to this day.

Ask questions. Whenever you need clarification, ask for a meeting with your health care providers. It can sometimes be confusing to navigate your child's medical concerns or understand the rationale behind any changes being made regarding their care. By sitting down with your child's primary health care providers or the NICU team, you can get a better handle on what is going on.

Try to connect with a primary nurse. Primary nurses are nurses who typically work with your child when they are on shift. If your hospital offers primary nurses, they will likely work with you for the majority of your NICU stay to ensure continuity of care. While Chelsea's son's stay was long, he was able to have a couple of primary nurses, which was extremely helpful since they really understood her son's needs.

Attend rounds when possible. Rounds occur when the NICU team meets to discuss and debrief regarding your child's care and next steps. When Chelsea's son was in the NICU, rounds were
