ABSTRACT

This paper discuss about the development of precision agriculture technology in Indonesia with their existing constraints and opportunities. Indonesia as an agricultural country has quite wide agricultural land and most of the people in this country are working in this sector. Yet, agricultural production has not been sufficient enough to fulfill the national demand so that the import policy is enforced. Based on studies from some literatures, the problems are related to agricultural management. The farmers still use conventional farming system by applying same treatment to their crops. The effort to increase agricultural production is to implement precision agricultural (PA) technology to obtain the optimization and the cost efficiency of land management. Many researches from institutions and corporations in Indonesia have been conducted on PA technology to revitalize Indonesian agricultural development, but some of it ended in scientific publications. In order to be accepted and applied in the region, it needs a sustainable program and integrated with the government plans. Farmers should be encouraged by fostering their knowledge, technology, networking, and information access in order to prepare them as modern agricultural actors in the 21st century.

Keywords: Precision agriculture, agricultural development, Indonesia

INTRODUCTION

In Southeast Asia, Indonesia is a country which has the biggest area, the highest population, and the richest natural resources. Beginning from a country in which the economy is based on traditional agriculture, Indonesia has become a country which has bigger manufacturing and service industries. Indonesia should position itself as the world's food security base, the manufacturing centre of agricultural, plantation, fishery, and mineral resources products, and also as the centre of global logistic mobilization (MP3EI, 2011). These potential should be managed optimally in order to increase the economy and the prosperity of the community.
