

On the Word of No One

The Importance of the Scientific Method

"Question with boldness even the existence of a God; because, if there be one, he must more approve of the homage of reason, than that of blindfolded fear." — Thomas Jefferson

"Nullus in verba" or "On the word of no one" basically means "Do not take people at their word, and find out for yourself." This idea is very relevant and essential in two contexts. In the context of science and learning, we must continue to question everything with boldness. Verification is the foundation of science; if something is true, it must be reproducible. In the context of government, we should be wise to verify things that the government tells us, whenever possible to do so. This philosophy sets the scientific method apart from other types of learning. It emphasizes the need for measurable and observable evidence. The ultimate goal of science is in gaining knowledge itself. It is undiluted by bias, emotional assumptions and politics. Especially in modern times, it is essential to have measurable and observable evidence to lead us through the flood of information all around us.

For my second video I chose "Eugenics and Francis Galton: Crash Course History of Science #29" which discusses how Francis Galton (Charles Darwin's cousin) took Darwin's evidence and twisted it to create modern Eugenics (which was 100% ting bananas). Galton was obsessed with the idea of genius and whether it was natural or if it primarily came from learning. Charles Darwin's book "The Origin of Species" led him to the idea that an organism's most essential characteristics must be biological rather than shaped by its environment. This is not a new idea; for centuries, various people worldwide have tried to keep their "bloodlines" pure in one way or another. Galton just put a name to idea. Eugenics is complete nonsense. However, it is notable that Galton pioneered a few credible scientific methods that would shape future science within the field of genetics. For example, he suggested the study of twins, hypothetically, as a natural experiment. If twins were raised apart and remain similar, it suggests that nature is more powerful than nurture and vice versa. In conclusion, even though Eugenics had one foot in the credible scientific community, it was wildly unscientific and is no longer considered to be science, and for good reason.

The scientific method must continue to be used to solve modern problems. Media sources push information to the masses at an unprecedented rate of speed. The information out there is not always accurate, and it takes a patient mind to sort through it all to the heart of the truth. The "Nullus in verba" philosopher is equally crucial to modern-day discourse. Modern politics is gradually becoming more and more extreme. To make matters worse, everyone is so confident that they are solely correct, and it is implausible that people with an opposing idea could be correct. The political middle is falling to the wayside behind radical ideas that plague both sides of the political spectrum. In such an atmosphere, we must remember that we live in a country where Eugenics was once an accepted idea in many Americans'
