

4.1 Objectives

To be known as customer-focused company offering products synonymous with usability, aesthetics, and innovation, whilst attaining a leading market share. To become the “iTunes” of consumer digital imaging and ‘digital lifestyle aggregation’.

4.2 The Digital Photography Market

Demand in the device side of the digital media market has driven similar growth in the follow-on services sector. These services include in-home and online printing, desktop organisation software, online sharing, and blogging services.

Revenue associated with film, photo developing, and printing has historically accounted for about two-thirds of personal photography spending. [3]

By eliminating the need for the purchase and development of film, digital imaging disrupts the value chain associated with the business of consumer imaging. Digitisation eliminates many of the intermediary services that used to exist between the user’s capture of an image with a camera and the ability to display and share the image. Consumers can now see, store, and share their images in digital form, without sending rolls of film to a developing service and without ever making a print. The digitisation of imaging also alters user behaviours toward images in even more radical ways, for example by making it feasible to create much larger image collections, and by creating new ways of sharing or manipulating images.

Photo-finishing is the core competency and main revenue stream for today’s key online digital photo services. While storage is offered by Kodak Gallery, Shutterfly and others, it is done so generally for free or at cost as an incentive for printing. This was seen to be a natural business direction from traditional film printing.

According to Daniel A. Carp, Chairman and CEO of Eastman Kodak Company, consumers are currently storing nearly 1 billion images at Kodak’s Gallery (Ofoto) service. Yet Ofoto focuses its growth strategy on finding new ways for consumers to print their photos at home or in retail locations. Their recently announced partnerships with major drug chains and big box retailers are consistent with this strategy.

While Ofoto currently provides simple online album sharing features, where users can send photos to other users, most features on Ofoto focus heavily on printing revenue, which is Kodak’s core competency.

Digital Photo Organisation

Image management products offer the capacity to store, organize, print, and in some cases process or manipulate images. This integrated capability for networking, organising, storing and manipulating images is the most distinctive feature of digital imaging.

Revenue associated with film, photo developing, and printing has historically accounted for about two-thirds of personal photography spending. [3]
