

Specifying a header size

The size of the header in the generated report can be different when rendered in PDF and in HTML. For an HTML report, the header dynamically resizes to accommodate its contents, and the header always appears directly above the report content. In an HTML report, the header height property is ignored.

For a PDF report, the header also dynamically resizes to accommodate its contents. Unlike the HTML report, you can specify a fixed size for the header. If you specify a header size of one inch, and you insert an image that is half an inch in height, the report displays half an inch of space between the image and the report data. If the header size you specify, however, is not sufficient to display a large image, the report overrides the specified header size and resizes the header to display the image in its entirety.

Increasing the header size is one way to increase the space between the header content and the report content. However, because header size applies only to PDF output, this technique is not recommended if you want to create a master page that serves both PDF and HTML output equally well.

The preferred technique to add space between the header content and report content is to increase the padding at the bottom of the text or label element placed in the header. Alternatively, if you use a grid to organize multiple elements, you can add a row at the bottom of the grid and set the row size.

Displaying page numbers, the current date, and other text

Common header and footer information includes the page number, report-generation date, company name, author name, copyright information, and confidentiality statements.

BIRT Report Designer provides predefined text elements for displaying some of these common items, including the current date, page number, author name, and file name. These items are available on the palette when the master page is displayed.
