

Abstract Key words

While being a promising approach, identifying and testing psychological stress biomarkers are hampered by global biological stressor effects. Effect sizes may be small, different people have different biological stressor responses, and the biological responses themselves may vary across different stressors. This manuscript offers suggestions on a way of circumventing these difficulties and aims to demonstrate that study of psychophysiological (PP) markers can identify biologically relevant signals.

1. Using psychophysiological measures to identify biologically relevant signals is based on theory, not on theory after the fact (Holtzman, 2010).

2. Biomarkers are the physiological or psychological signals at the PP level that indicate the presence of a biological stressor. (Holtzman, 2010). The ability to test theory, through biomarkers, is strengthened when these have already been identified through the different studies and the physiological and psychological signals identified are used to make predictions.
