Responses to Questions

1. The three major “accelerators” are the accelerator pedal, the brake pedal, and the steering wheel. The accelerator pedal (or gas pedal) can be used to increase speed (by depressing the pedal) or to decrease speed in combination with friction (by releasing the pedal). The brake pedal can be used to decrease speed by depressing it. The steering wheel is used to change direction, which also is an acceleration. There are some other controls that could also be considered accelerators. The parking brake can be used to decrease speed by depressing it. The gear shift lever can be used to decrease speed by downshifting. If the car has a manual transmission, then the clutch can be used to decrease speed by depressing it (friction will slow the car), or, if on a steep downward incline, depressing the clutch can allow the car to increase speed. Finally, shutting the engine off can be used to decrease the car’s speed. Any change in speed or direction means that an object is accelerating.
2. Yes, the centripetal acceleration will be greater when the speed is greater since centripetal acceleration is proportional to the square of the speed (when the radius is constant): $a_R = \frac{v^2}{r}$. When the speed is higher, the acceleration has a larger magnitude.
3. No, the acceleration will not be the same. The centripetal acceleration is inversely proportion to the radius (when the speed is constant): $a_R = \frac{v^2}{r}$. Traveling around a sharp curve, with a smaller radius, will require a larger centripetal acceleration than traveling around a gentle curve, with a larger radius.
4. The three main forces on the child are the downward force of gravity (the child’s weight), the normal force up on the child from the horse, and the static frictional force on the child from the surface of the horse. The frictional force provides the centripetal acceleration. If there are other forces, such as contact forces between the child’s hands or legs and the horse, which have a radial component, they will contribute to the centripetal acceleration.
5. On level ground, the normal force on the child would be the same magnitude as his weight. This is the “typical” situation. But as the child and sled come over the crest of the hill, they are moving in a
