

Answer. Pavlov proved generalisation to be true by noticing that conditioned stimulus and conditioned responses form a bond by conditioning. This meant that any stimuli which are similar to conditioned stimuli are bound to produce the same response and this is known as generalisation. For example, if anyone is conditioned to get food and hence, secrete saliva, after the sounding of a particular bell, the sounding of another kind of bell, like, a phone ring can produce a similar response.

Discrimination involves making different specific responses to different stimuli, this may also include making no responses to some particular stimuli. For example, if a child is conditioned to be afraid of black cars, no signs of fear would be shown when the child is encountered with a white car.

Q8 How does transfer of learning takes place?

Answer. The human brain also works by transferring skills that we learn in one situation to others. For example, learning to use water colours may give rise to certain skills involved with learning to make oil paintings. However, if the learner has benefited with that particular skill in the past, only then, transfer occurs. Referring to the effects of prior learning to new learning, negative transfer is made when the new learning is related. Zero transfer is when the prior learning has no effects on the new one.

Q9 Why is motivation a prerequisite for learning?

Answer. Motivation is a must for learning. It's a mental as well as a physiological state which rigorously energises an individual to do a certain task at hand.

Motivation has two main sources:

Intrinsic motivation: one learns things faster and with efficiency when its the topic of their personal interest, or would help them achieve a certain goal.

Extrinsic motivation: any person has the ability to attain their chosen knowledge and skills and get the job done.
