

I couldn't do it, but I'm glad some parents could let their 15-year-old daughter get into a 40-foot sailboat and attempt to be the youngest person to sail around the world.

If it had been me, I would've belted my kid out of doing any such thing. I'm like most parents: terrified that something terrible will befall one of my children and aware that I'll blame myself if it does.

But we worried parents need to take a lesson from the Sunderlands. Their daughter Abby had a dream since she was 13. She was competent and experienced and spent her whole childhood sailing with her father, who is a sailing instructor. This wasn't a whim. It was a notion that she had the courage to do; her parents had the courage to let her do it.

Today, parents are so steeped in worry and anticipation of unforeseen disaster that they fail to realize how restrictive and over-protective they have become. We believe that our children will never reach adulthood without our constant monitoring and supervision.

Age is increasingly becoming an arbitrary marker for adulthood. I have known some 15-year-olds whom I would trust with my life and some 40-year-olds who couldn't be trusted to find the dock where Wild Eyes, Abby Sunderland's sailboat, was berthed. And we forget that in earlier centuries, children took on far greater challenges and risks than do today's children.

Each child has to be judged and tested on the basis of his or her maturity, their achievements to date and whether he or she is competent to make such important decisions for themselves. Abby's parents faced these questions before with their son Zac, who, at 17, became the youngest person to sail solo around the globe. The family was experienced at helping Abby weigh the pros and cons because of Zac's experience on his journey, the father's experience as a sailor, and Abby's many years sailing.

There is no way I would let my kids sail around the globe, no matter how talented they were. But that doesn't make me a better parent, just a more cautious one. We need parents like the Sunderlands and their children to remind us that there is more to life than keeping our children safe.
