There are some very good reasons to believe that the world is not just a random collection of events. The world is a complex system, and it is possible to understand it by studying its parts and how they interact. This is the idea of systems thinking, and it is a powerful tool for understanding the world around us.

As a student of English literature with a background in mathematics, I have found that the two fields share a common goal: to understand the world through the power of language and logic. My journey in English literature has been a quest for meaning, a search for the universal truths that lie beneath the surface of our human experience. I have been captivated by the intricate plots of Shakespeare's plays, the profound insights of Victorian novels, and the powerful messages of modernist poetry. Each work I read has opened a new window into the human mind, revealing the complexities of our emotions, our desires, and our fears. My background in mathematics has provided me with a unique perspective on these literary works, allowing me to see the underlying structures and patterns that govern our world. I have found that the same principles of logic and reasoning that I learned in my math classes can be applied to the analysis of literary texts, helping me to uncover the hidden meanings and themes that lie beneath the surface of the words. This interdisciplinary approach has not only deepened my understanding of both fields but has also allowed me to develop a more holistic view of the world. I am grateful for the opportunity to explore these subjects and look forward to continuing my journey of discovery and learning.
