

Human Migration

Throughout history, humans have migrated across the planet. We can see this simply by the fact that there are humans everywhere that they can live comfortably, yet the very first humans are believed to have originated in Africa alone.

The factors that drove humans to migrate changed over time, but there were some that remained consistent. Safety, hunger and the search for water were always important factors; before humans learned to farm, they had to move to find fresh sources of food.

Early humans didn't settle for long in a particular place. When somebody moves from place to place, they are called "nomadic". Some nomadic tribes moved between winter and summer locations: one benefit of this was that they knew where to find food and water in each season.

When early humans first left Africa, they first moved into Europe and Asia. This is believed to have happened roughly 200,000 years ago, but it all depends on what you consider "human". Don't forget, the only way for these early relations to travel was on foot, so migrating across countries and continents took many generations. Not only that, it appears that humans dispersed from Africa in waves over thousands of years and often mixed with Neanderthals (another early human ancestor).

Around 60,000 - 20,000 years ago, migrants travelled to North America. It is possible they travelled by sea, or there might have been a land bridge that is now hidden beneath the ocean. At around the same time, other prehistoric migrants set out from Asia and landed on the shores of Australia. From there, they were able to settle on all of the Pacific islands. Interestingly, New Zealand was only settled within the last 1,200 years.

In more modern history, humans have continued to migrate. The Hebrews fled slavery in Egypt somewhere around 1,200 BCE. They settled in Palestine.

There have been other migrant tribes that were very successful. The Huns (especially when led by Attila the Hun) and the Mongols (under Genghis Khan) ruled over large areas of land in Asia and
